EDITORIAL

NEW LIFE BLOOD

If the opening prices at the dark fired tobacco markets this week is any sort of a criterion of what we may expect to continue through the season, then we are apparantly in for a genuine return of prosperity to the dark tobacco belt.

Our farmers are less in debt, on an average than they have been any period since 1922. They will be very much in the market for commodities in the next few months. It is our opinion that the farmer offers the greatest market in the nation today. The road to recovery is a hard surfaced past the farmers door. New life blood has been shot into the business stream at this additional source.

The farmers richly deserve the best. We hope that the opening day tobacco prices will continue.

Dr. Ralph C. Epstein, dean of the University of Buffalo school of Business Administration, says that if all incomes in this country were limited to $5,000, the average income would be increased by just $1. What we need is not a redistribution of wealth, but a production of more wealth.

PENSION AND SALES TAX

The latest proposal in Virginia is that a vote by the people go decide the issue of old age pensions.

However, the proposal also calls for the referendum to decide how the pension would be financed. And by means that to vote for the pension you would have to vote for a sales tax. Virginia won't do it and such a scheme would kill pension prospects.

MISTAKEN IDENTITY

"BALDY" MONTGOMERY rode into Devil's Gap with but a single purpose in mind: To satisfy the craving of six months for excitement in large and frequent quantities. For six long months he had nursed cows in a lonely range camp on the land of the Double O Bar cattle outfit. Six months of storing up a surplus of desire and craving for the best excitement that Devil's Gap could offer.

Baldy was new in the country, but brother cow waddies of the Double O Bar had advised him that Devil's Gap could satisfy any man's longing for diversion from the monotonous task of nursing cows and long-horned steers.

Hence the youth's spirits soared as the outlying buildings of the squat little town reared themselves on the horizon. With something like smug satisfaction on his features, he patted the bulge in his overall's pocket, a bulge which represented a little more than $200 in nice, crisp greenbacks. Six months wages! And six months of stored-up energy with which to spend it.

Baldy chucked to his tired mount and waved in friendly fashion as he passed the first dwelling and beheld an aged native sucking contentedly on his pipe before the door stoop.

Minutes later he was passing down the town's main street, with false-fronted business houses on either hand. His eye caught a sign, suggesting that behind a pair of green, swinging doors liquid refreshments could be had for the asking. Eagerly he turned his mount in that direction.

At his approach, a few loungers on the verandas of the saloon leaped suddenly to their feet and peered at him in excited fashion. Abruptly, one of them jerked out his six-shooter, deliberately aimed it and fired. Baldy's ten-gallon sombrero left his head and went soaring down the street, revealing the egg-like cerebellum from which the cowboy derived his sobriquet.

"It's him!" yelled one of the loungers. "It's him!"

The cry was repeated and relayed inside the saloon. More men appeared on the verandas. A fusillade of shots began to hum and whiz about Baldy's ears.

Baldy's first reaction was that the thing was a joke, that this was the Devil's Gap manner of greeting him. But when one of the bullets nipped a button off his shirt front, he changed his mind. These hombres were in dead earnest, no falsieke.

Without pausing to give the matter immediate thought, Baldy leaped from the back of his sorrel and sprinted for the safety of a rubbish pile across the way. Bullets kicked up little dust clouds at his feet.

Once ensconced in temporary safety behind the heaps and barrels, Baldy produced his own six-shooter and began to take pot shots at whatever parts of human anatomy were visible on the saloon verandas. The odds, however, were very much against him. He knew he'd have to get out of there, and get out of there fast, if he desired to retain a whole hide, which he very much wished to do.

For just an instant Baldy thought of the peace and quiet of the Double O Bar range, and wished he were back there. Then his eye glimpsed an alley-way beyond the rubbish pile, and he decided to make a break in that direction.

After weighing his chances, briefly, he decided that the present was as good a time as any. His first leap carried him almost to the alley entrance. His next leap completed the journey. And, then, abruptly, he stopped. A half dozen men, guns ready, were crouched in the alley-way.

At sight of him they let up a shout and leaped forward. Baldy didn't have a chance. He was disarmed and bound before he could repeat his name twice. From across the street an angry mob of men swarmed from the saloon. They set up joyous shouts of glee at sight of the helpless victim and laid ungentle hands upon him.

Baldy found himself being led down the main street of the town toward a cottonwood, with a rope around his neck. The purpose of the mob was plain. And it was plain also that they had mistaken him for some one else, a fact which they didn't, for one moment, seem to take into consideration. Baldy made one desperate attempt to explain who he was, and received a belt across his mouth that rattled his teeth. Thereafter he remained silent.

One end of the rope was thrown over a limb of the cottonwood. Baldy was placed atop his own mount, and the rope drawn tight.

"Baldy Simmons," said the spokesman of the group, "if you know how to pray, start now. You've led a low-down, mean life. In hanging you till you're dead, we're doing a service to humanity that can never be repaid. Boys, pull the rope!"

Baldy opened his mouth for one last, frantic appeal. But at that moment, from the other end of the street, a hoarse shout was heard. Horsemen, riding hell-bent, guns drawn threateningly, were bearing down on the lynching party. The man who held the rope dropped it and set up a shout.

"It's Baldy's henchmen! Come to rescue him! Get to cover, everyone!"

There was a mad scramble. Baldy suddenly found himself alone, with a ferocious looking bunch of horsemen riding like mad in his general direction. As the horsemen drew near, the concealed lynching party opened fire. The riders returned bullet for bullet. Leaden slugs for the second time began to whistle and hum about Baldy's ears. Then, suddenly he felt the rope about his neck grow slack. The thongs that bound his wrists dropped away. The sorrel leaped forward.

Hardly aware of what was taking place, Baldy grasped the reins and guided his mount behind the protecting shelter of a group of buildings. The sorrel seemed to appreciate the seriousness of his task, and stretched out in a dead run, pointing his nose toward the Double O Bar and the lonely range camps.

Behind him Baldy heard the continued fighting of the lynching party and the raiders. The firing grew fainter and fainter, eventually fading into nothingness.

At length, Baldy drew the racing sorrel to a halt, rubbed his chafed wrists, heaved a great and vast sigh of relief and rolled him off a brown paper cigarette.

"Well," he soliloquized, "I'll be d—d."

He turned once to stare back in the general direction of Devil's Gap, and shook his head.

"Hiddim," he said, speaking to the sorrel. "I've had my six months of pent-up desire for excitement satisfied in six short minutes. We're going home and get the craving all over again."

The sorrel whinnied understandingly and, despite its fatigue, set off at a rapid trot. Both horse and rider seemed eager to reach once more the peace and quiet of the Double O Bar range.
